

In King Arthur's dreams, he and his knights have been sent on a search for great knowledge. Information passed along from the highwayman Stevens indicates that clues may be found by following the roots of the fourth generation of ancient trees, which he repeatedly referred to as tubes. A long-lost treasure map with bright colors on faded parchment has found its way into Arthur's hands. It is said that the interpretation of the map serves as an index of one's understanding of the trees' roots, which will guide the seekers to the places they ought to look.